

Da es im Bellum Iugurthinum grundsätzlich darum geht, die moralische Verkommenheit großer Teile der römischen Nobilität anzuprangern, gibt es neben den bereits gelesenen mehrere weitere Passagen, in denen Sallust das Thema zur Sprache bringt.

Die folgende Passage stammt aus Kap.13. Hiempsal ist gerade ermordet worden, Adherbal nach Rom geflohen, um dort Hilfe zu erbitten.

Roms Reaktion auf die Ermordung Adherbals

Die Nachricht von der brutalen Ermordung Adherbals (_____ v.Chr.) gelangt nach Rom, doch die "Handlanger des Königs" (ministri regis) setzen sich wieder für ihn ein: (27,1) idem illi ministri regis interpellando ac saepe gratia, interdum iurgiis trahundo tempus atrocitatem facti leniebant.

Sie wären mit ihren Verzögerungstaktiken und ihrem Abwiegen auch erfolgreich gewesen, wenn nicht ein einzelner Mann, ein designierter Volkstribun namens Gaius Memmius, "ein Feind der Macht der Nobilität" - (27,2) vir infestus potentiae nobilitatis - das römische Volk über die Machenschaften des Königs und Hintergründe aufgeklärt hätte:

- 30 (27,2) Ac ni C. Memmius, tribunus plebis designatus, vir acer et infestus potentiae nobilitatis, populum Romanum edocuisse id agi, ut per paucos factiosos Iugurthae scelus condonaretur, profecto omnis invidia prolatandis consultationibus dilapsa foret: tanta vis gratiae atque pecuniae regis erat.

Lucius Calpurnius Bestia, Consul

- 34 (28,7) *Igitur Calpurnius initio acriter Numidiam ingressus est multosque mortalēs

Calpurnius Bestia handelt mit Jugurtha seine "Unterwerfung" aus: Gezahlt werden "dreißig Elefanten, Vieh und viele Pferde zusammen mit einem geringen Gewicht Silber" - (29,5) elephantī triginta, pecus atque equi multi cum parvo argenti pondere. "In Numidien," so konstatiert Sallust trocken, "und in unserem Heer herrschte Frieden" - (29,7) In Numidia et exercitu nostro Pax agitabatur.

aus: Asterix und die Schweizer

Dass Calpurnius Bestia bestochen worden war, war so offensichtlich, dass die Empörung in den Straßen Roms allgegenwärtig war und der Senat sich ernsthaft sorgte - (30,1) apud plebem gravis invidia, patres solliciti erant. Der oben bereits erwähnte Gaius Memmius fachte immer wieder die wütende Stimmung an. Sallust legt ihm eine Rede in den Mund, in der er gegen die Nobilität wettert. Darin heißt es u.a.:

Ein wütender Volkstribun

Bomilcar findet einen Mörder für Massiva; doch läuft die Angelegenheit nicht so glatt wie geplant. Eine Spur führt zu Bomilcar, der daraufhin des Mordes angeklagt wird. Der folgende Textausschnitt stammt noch einmal aus Colleen McCulloughs The First Man in Rome. Bei dem im Text genannten Lucius Decumius handelt es sich um den (fiktiven!) Mörder des Massiva, der Bomilcar im "Gefängnis" besucht. Da Rom kein Gefängnis im heutigen Sinn besaß, hatte man Bomilcar in den Lautumiae (wörtl.: Steinbrüche) untergebracht, einer Art Freiluftgefängnis, das von Liktoren mehr oder minder gründlich bewacht wurde.

(p.116f.; audio 5.27-5.36)

[...] "Who squealed on you, friend?" Decumius asked, perching his skinny body on a fallen block of masonry.

Controlling his tendency to shake, Bomilcar licked his lips. "Well, if it wasn't you before, you fool, it certainly is now!" he snapped.

Eyes widening, Decumius stared at him; a slow comprehension was dawning. "Here, here, friend, don't you worry about things like that," he said soothingly. "There's no one to hear us, just a couple of lictors on the door, and that's twenty paces off. I heard you got arrested, so I thought I'd better come and see what went wrong."

"Agelastus," said Bomilcar. "Marcus Servilius Agelastus!"

"Want me to do the same to him I did to Prince Massiva?"

"Look, will you just get out of here?" cried Bomilcar, despairing. "Don't you understand that they'll start to wonder why you've come? If anyone caught a glimpse of your face near Prince Massiva, you're a dead man!"

"It's all right, friend, it's all right! Stop worrying - no one knows about me, and no one cares a fig that I'm here. This ain't no Parthian dungeon, friend, honest! They only put you in here to throw your boss into fits, that's all. They won't care a whole lot if you do a moonlight flit, it'll just brand you guilty." And he pointed to the gap in the outside wall.

"I can't run away," said Bomilcar.

"Suit yourself," Decumius shrugged. "Now, what about this Agelastus bird? Want him out of the way? I'll do it for the same price - payable on delivery this time; I trust you."

Fascinated, Bomilcar came by logical progression to the conclusion that not only did Lucius Decumius believe what he said, but he was undoubtedly correct to do so. If it hadn't been for Jugurtha, he would now have availed himself of the moonlit escape; but if he yielded to the temptation, only the gods knew what might happen to Jugurtha.

"You've got yourself another bag of gold," he said.

"Where's he live, this fellow who - judging by his name, anyway - never smiles?"

On the Caelian Hill, in the vicus Capiti Africæ.

"Oh, nice new district!" said Decumius appreciatively. "Agelastus must be doing all right for himself, eh? Still, makes him easy to find, living out there where the birds sing louder than the neighbours. Don't worry! I'll do it for you straight away. Then when your boss gets you out of here, you can pay me. Just send the gold to me at the club. I'll be there to take delivery."

"How do you know my boss will get me out of her?"

"Course he will, friend! They've only chucked you in here to give him a fright. Couple more days and they'll let him bail you out. But when they do, take my advice and go home as fast as you can. Don't stay around in Rome, all right?"

"Leaving the King here at their mercy? I couldn't!"

"Course you can, friend! What do you think they'll do to him here in Rome? Knock him on the head and chuck him in the Tiber? No! Never! That's not how they work, friend," said Lucius Decumius the expert counsellor.

"There's only one thing they'll murder for, and that's their precious Republic. You know, the laws and the Constitution and stuff like that. They might kill the odd tribune of the plebs or two, like they did Tiberius and Gaius Gracchus, but they'd never kill a foreigner, not in Rome. Don't you worry about your boss, friend. My bet is, they'll send him home, too, if you get away."

Bomilcar gazed at Decumius in wonder. "And yet, you don't even know where Numidia is!" he said slowly. "You've never been to Italy! How do you know then the workings of Roman noblemen?"

"Well, that's different," said Lucius Decumius, getting up from this stone and preparing to depart. "Mother's milk, friend, mother's milk! We all drink it in along with mother's milk. I mean, aside from windfalls like you coming along, where else can a Roman get a thrill except in the Forum when there's no Games? And you don't even have to go there in the flesh to get the thrill. It comes to you, friend. Just like mother's milk."

Bomilcar held out his hand. "I thank you, Lucius Decumius. You are the only completely honest man I've met in Rome. I'll have your money sent to you."

"Don't forget, now, to the club! Oh, and" - his right forefinger went up to touch the right side of his nose - "if you've got any friends need a bit of practical help solving their little problems, let 'em know I take on a bit of outside contracting! I like this line of work."

Agelastus died, but since Bomilcar was in the Lautumiae and neither of the lictors thought to connect Decumius with the reason for Bomilcar's imprisonment, the case Spurius and Aulus Albinus were preparing against the Numidian baron weakened. They still possessed the deposition they had extracted from Agelastus, but there was no doubt his absence as chief witness for the prosecution was a blow. Seizing the opportunity the death of Agelastus afforded him, Jugurtha applied again to the Senate for bail for Bomilcar. Though Gaius Memmius and Scaurus argued passionately against its being granted, in the end Baron Bomilcar was released upon Jugurtha's handing over fifty of his Numidian attendants into Roman custody, they were distributed among the households of fifty senators, and Jugurtha was made to give over a large sum of money to the State, ostensibly to pay for the upkeep of his hostages.

His cause, of course, was irreparably damaged. However, he had ceased to care, for he knew he had no hope of ever obtaining Roman approval of his kingship. Not because of the death of Massiva, but because Romans had never intended to approve his kingship. They had been tormenting him for years, making him dance to their tune, and laughing at him behind their hands. So, with or without the consent of the Senate, he was going home. Home to raise an army and begin to train it to fight the legions which were bound to come.

Bomilcar fled to Puteoli the moment he was set free, took ship there for Africa, and got away clean. Whereupon the Senate washed its hands on Jugurtha. Go home, they said, giving him back his fifty hostages (but not his money). Get out of Rome, get out of Italy, get out of our lives.

The King of Numidia's last sight of Rome was from the top of the Janiculum, which he made his horse climb simply so he could look upon the shape of his fate. Rome. There it lay, rolling and rippling amid its sudden cliff faces, seven hills and the valleys between, a sea of orange-red roof tiles and brightly painted stuccoed walls, the gilded ornaments adorning temple pediments throwing shafts of light in glitters back into the sky, little highways for the gods to use. A vivid and colourful terra-cotta city, green with trees and grasses where the space permitted.

Yet, Jugurtha saw nothing to admire. He looked for a long time, sure he would never see Rome again.

"A city for sale," he said then, "and when it finds a buyer, it will vanish in the twinkling of an eye."

And he turned away towards the Via Ostiensis.

O urbem venalem!

67 (35,6) *Fit reus magis ex aequo bonoque quam ex iure gentium Bomilcar, comes eius, qui Romam fide publica venerat.
